

See more news releases in

Advocacy Group Opinion (<http://www.prnewswire.com/news-releases/policy-public-interest-latest-news/advocacy-group-opinion/>)

Nation Must Look At North Carolina's "Moral Mondays" To Fight Right Wing Surges, Say Robert Weiner And Bridget Mora In Michigan Chronicle

WASHINGTON, July 9, 2014 /PRNewswire-USNewswire/ -- The nation must look at North Carolina's "Moral Mondays" to fight right wing legislative surges that have overridden moderate constituencies in states, say Robert Weiner and Bridget Mora in an article in the Michigan Chronicle.

Weiner, a former White House spokesman and senior congressional committee staffer for four congressmen, and Mora, a writer from Chapel Hill, NC, the heart of "Moral Mondays", point out that "Millions and often majorities in Michigan and states around the country are under attack by right wing governors and legislatures on voting rights, voter suppression, removal of elected officials' power, gun safety, attempted denial of insurance benefits and Medicaid coverage under the Affordable Care Act, college education, veterans' health care, women's health choices, and jobs." Weiner and Mora contend that North Carolina's "Moral Mondays" movement, spreading rapidly to other states, "aims to help ordinary citizens take back their state governments from corporate-backed extremists."

In North Carolina, "Moral Mondays" mean weekly large organized protests, sit-ins, demonstrations, and some nonviolent civil disobedience, all at the state legislature in Raleigh, plus accompanying media coverage, according to Weiner and Mora. They explain, "Each Moral Monday group has a distinctive local flavor and key issues. Voter suppression and education are flash points in North Carolina. Georgia and Florida protesters rally for repeal of 'Stand Your Ground' laws. High unemployment and union busting are the focus in Wisconsin. What every Moral Monday group has is a coalition of diverse groups fighting for social justice for the poor, minorities, women, children, elderly, disabled, and immigrants. The organizations don't always share the same opinions, but have a common enemy in the radical politicians who underrepresent their state's constituencies and enact policies removing their rights."

They point out that "Michigan is under attack by Governor Rick Snyder and an extremist state legislature who have disenfranchised voters, unilaterally taken away Detroit's constitutional electoral power and appointed an unelected manager, given $1.8 billion tax giveaways to corporate interests, raised taxes on seniors and working families, starved public schools while pushing private schools, denied pensions' funding, passed 'Right to Work' laws to slash unions' effectiveness, and assaulted women's healthcare and human dignity including with so-called 'rape insurance.'" They say that in addition, "Now you can add the City Manager and state Governor allowing the water company to stop supplying poor people for nonpayment from financial inability but letting hugely profitable big corporations delay their water bill obligations."

They contend that in Michigan, "circumventing the will of voters is a top priority of Governor Snyder, who proposed to repeal the minimum wage (and preempt a 2014 voter referendum) and disempowered Detroit's elected officials, despite a statewide referendum vote against the emergency-manager law." They cite Reverend D. Alexander Bullock, President of the Detroit chapter of the Rainbow/PUSH Coalition, who called Snyder's hostile takeover of Michigan's largest city "the death of democracy in Detroit." They also quote House Judiciary Committee Ranking Member Cong. John Conyers of Detroit, who called the Emergency Manager Law "unconstitutional."

Weiner and Mora say that what's happening in Michigan is "part of a national attack on individual rights by corporate-backed state legislatures and governors. The North Carolina General Assembly turned their state into one of the most right-wing in the nation. They passed draconian voter suppression, eliminated the Earned Income Tax Credit for nearly 1 million working poor, would not help 43,000 Michiganders whose unemployment benefits ended, made it difficult for students to vote, rejected Medicaid coverage for 500,000, drastically restricted women's access to reproductive healthcare, repealed the Racial Justice Act, slashed public education funding, and stripped high school teachers and college student voters of due process."

However, the writers say that "North Carolinians have fought back." Weiner and Mora assert that North Carolinians have created "a national model." Specifically, Moral Mondays, started just a year ago by Rev. William Barber of the North Carolina NAACP, "have spread like wildfire in 2014 -- into Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and South Carolina (where protests are called 'Truthful Tuesdays'). It's no longer just a Southern movement." They cite Rev. Curtis Gatewood of the North Carolina NAACP, who reports that Missouri and Wisconsin joined the movement, and more states are mobilizing.

Weiner and Mora contend that "many of the right wing bills come from ALEC (American Legislative Exchange Council), a dangerous organization that pushes corporate-backed model bills in state legislatures across the US, including the infamous 'Stand Your Ground' legislation justifying what has often been perceived as murder," according to Weiner and Mora. They report that North Carolina's House Speaker, Thom Tillis, was named ALEC's 'Legislator of the Year'. They also point to Michigan's Right to Work law as "modeled on an ALEC bill."

Weiner and Mora argue that "Moral Monday organizers don't expect to change the minds of ALEC lawmakers; they work to change the landscape." They quote Rev. Barber, who said, "The people have moved. Now less than one in five North Carolinians agree with them. Moral Monday is more popular than them." They also cite Brett Bursey, Executive Director of the South Carolina Progressive Network, who explained that a key aim of the protests is to support moderate candidates because in South Carolina, over 70% of candidates ran unopposed.

Weiner and Mora contend, "Parliamentary tricks can be overcome by voters who replace the legislators who took away their rights. People can resist efforts to suppress the vote and make it a point to turn out in large numbers, as President Obama's campaign accomplished in 2008 and 2012."

They point out that "voter turnout drops by a shocking 50 million in non-Presidential election years. The biggest drop-down is minorities, young people, and lower incomes—opening the door for a right wing takeover." To counter the apathy, they report that Moral Mondays are gearing up for a "mass voter mobilization campaign."

Weiner and Mora conclude, "In Michigan and across the nation, massive voter turnout in support of candidates who value people – not large corporations' profits – is the best hope to recapture rights, power, and policy."

Robert Weiner is a former Clinton White House spokesman and senior staff for Cong. John Conyers, Charles Rangel, Ed Koch, Claude Pepper, and Sen. Ted Kennedy. Bridget Mora is a writer from Chapel Hill, NC, studies "Moral Mondays", advocates for public schools and autism insurance reform, and is policy analyst for Solutions for Change, a foundation informing the public about issues.

Contact: Bob Weiner 301-283-0821 or 202-306-1200 weinerpublic@comcast.net
(<mailto:weinerpublic@comcast.net>)

SOURCE Robert Weiner Associates

More by this Source

---

Ballot Problems Over, Conyers' Legacy Continues With Push For Jobs Says Bob Weiner, Former White House And Conyers Spokesman; Column In Michigan Chronicle
(<http://www.prnewswire.com/news-releases/ballot-problems-over-conyers-legacy-continues-with-push-for-jobs-says-bob-weiner-former-white-house-and-conyers-spokesman-column-in-michigan-chronicle-261726651.html>)

Jun 03, 2014, 16:59 ET

Former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell at National Press Club Newsmaker Tuesday, May 20, 10AM (<http://www.prnewswire.com/news-releases/former-senate-majority-leader-george-mitchell-at-national-press-club-newsmaker-tuesday-may-20-10am-259781151.html>)

May 19, 2014, 08:04 ET

View all news by Robert Weiner Associates

(<http://www.prnewswire.com/news/robert+weiner+associates>)